

5/12/11

As a member of the Dyslexia Interim Study Committee, I heard many hours of testimony from parents. We had parents from rural and urban areas give testimony about seeking help for their children with dyslexia in public schools. The classroom teacher is the first person a parent approaches to seek information about dyslexia. Our entire committee felt strongly about providing information at the undergraduate level to education majors at state universities. We will be able to provide help for children in both urban and rural areas by training more teachers.
